I know some of you want this thread to die, but I feel like I need to express my own opinions because why not.

I personally believe that the the role of moderator isn't a paid job, or even a job in the first place. It's probably just a hobby that some Scholastic employers participate in their free time or whatever. If that is the case, then I think it's very generous of the mods to even be here at all.

Next, the Mods are probably employees to the much larger, and far more powerful Scholastic. We don't know if they're following guidelines put in place by their bosses, so if you want to blame someone, blame Scholastic.

(Can't write sentences anymore)

- Mods are people too, and therefore make mistakes. They also have lives and families, and other things to work on, so they can't be here 24/7.

-I disagree with some of things the mods do, but it's important to remember that maybe they have a reason for what they do. The Hurricane post could've possibly turned into a mess, especially considering the Internet is full of all sort of mean and nasty people. We don't know if someone was about to post something ugly on there, so perhaps the mods were just trying to avoid a future flame war. But who knows, that's just a theory. Maybe they thought it was too revealing, idk.

-It's important to remember that this is a relatively tiny website full of angst filled teenagers, teens, and possibly younger audiences. Our problems our sorta insignificant compared to other troubles Scholastic has to deal with, and considering how many petty wars we've had over the years, they probably don't take us THAT seriously.

- The mods have acknowledged that we are capable of far more, but we also must remember they are adults (I think, anyways) and have had much more experience than most of us.

- Not trying to be hurtful, but a former as a mod, no matter how active they've been on here, can make mistakes as easily as the mods. Who's to say they wouldn't side with other formers, or feel pressured? If one forumer became a mod, what's stopping everyone else from becoming one? Like I said, children's website full of children.

Anyways, I know Mods make mistakes, and some problems definitely need to be answer or solved, but trying to get yourself made a mod isn't a good way to fix things. Sorry, but your chances are slim. I suggest maybe making your own WOF forum, and honestly I think that would be a better alternative for more mature audiences on here. I don't think it's hard, I once had a friend who made one.

So, that's all I have to say. I could be right, or I could be wrong, but I hope it opens up some people's eyes.

Forgive me for my spelling and grammar. I'm on mobile and I don't really care anyways.

@Angie, if your post is receiving so little attention that you have to be constantly typing "up", then how important can it really be to the forum community?

@Eclipse I don't think a post with 41 stars is getting "little" attention.

It's just annoying for some people, I think. Most of the people who have seen it and starred it are already aware of how you feel, but don't want to hear about it constantly.

But constant bumping isn't doing anything. The only reason I'm still checking is because I keep thinking maybe something important was said.

I'm not upset, but a bunch of people have already seen it and have gotten your message. Now, most of it is just "up". I know there is nothing wrong with bumping a thread, people do it all the time, but this it a lot of bumps. All of which, I might add, are from you.

I agree with you.

in scholastic we don't really count as "citizens." Were more "just some random people. Scholastic hired the mods, and your asking for scholastic to hire you. Shoot them a e. mail about this, then I think your probability of them actually paying attention to you is much much higher. I'm on board with you angie!
